

Beneath its cold, forbidding, gray skin the ship is alive with the pulsating activity of a thriving metropolis. For this vessel is composed of men, men who must produce, men who rightfully desire the amenities and pleasures of life in exchange for their productive effort, men who must care for themselves and their possessions if they are to survive.

